The NHL's Board of Governors will vote on a plan to expand its playoffs from 12 to 14 teams. Here's the plan. The NHL's Board of Governors could vote on a plan that would make the Stanley Cup Playoffs an event of a different magnitude than the regular season. And that plan, from the league's deputy commissioner, Bill Daly, would see the number of teams increase from 12 to 14 and expand the playoffs from a two-round affair to a four-round affair. The league is going to get the chance to voice its opinion as the Board of Governors convenes on Friday in New York, Daly said. The meeting is slated to start at 9:30 a.m. ET. The plan would have all 12 division winners make the playoffs, with the top two seeds from each division holding home-ice advantage in the first round. But then the playoff format would open up, and the first round would consist of all 12 teams who make the playoffs. "There would be no difference in the first round between the 12 teams," Daly said. "[The second round] would have a crossover between the four divisions and have the top two seeds from each division. And then the top eight remaining teams would be seeded one through eight in the first round. "[In the third round] there would be a crossover between the four divisions, and then the top four remaining teams would be seeded one through four in the first round. And then the top eight remaining teams would be seeded one through eight in the first round. And then the top eight remaining teams would be seeded one through eight in the first round. "And then the final two wild-card teams would be seeded fifth and sixth overall in the first round," Daly said. This doesn't mean the postseason would be conducted in a league-wide format. Instead, the final two playoff spots would be given to the first-half winners from each conference, 82157476af
